On the bridge he saw a figure approaching him, also in a gray surtout. The face was hidden or imperfectly seen, but on the breast he saw a wound, with blood streaming down over the gray coat. He approached it and extended his hand. The figure vanished away. He knew that by the laws of second sight it was the shadow of himself. He inquired of the inhabitants of the village what they called it. They answered, "Carillon." He asked again whether there was no other name. They answered, "Ticonderoga." On this he made his will, and he conjured the officers, if he fell, to search out his body. On the morrow took place the fatal conflict. They sought everywhere, and at length they found him wrapped in his overcoat, the wound in front, and the blood streaming over the gray coat, as he described the figure to his brother-officers.

The intelligent keeper of the village inn gave me the point of a rusty bayonet, dug out from the hillside, which I brought home and placed on the monument of Colonel Townsend, where it may stiff be seen in Westminster Abbey. With these reminiscences, we left Ticonderoga and reached Saratoga at mid-night. Before retiring to rest I was turning over the pages of Lossing's "Revolu-tionary War," when, in the description of the burial of Jane Macrea, at Fort Ed-ward, my eye fell on these words: "Her grave is near an old brown headstone on which are inscribed the words, 'Here lyes the body of Duncan Campbel', THE ROMANTIC CONNECTION BETWEEN THESE
